FLOOR DEBATE

April 8, 2004 LB 958

before and I imagine...I don't want to speak for Senator Foley or anybody else, but my guess is perhaps that's why.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: So your principles of, in terms of defending the unborn child, this full human being, extends right to the point where pragmatism is encountered.

SENATOR MAXWELL: No, the principles go...are unlimited, but what can you accomplish? You have to take that...I guess I'd say you'd probably have to take that in bites, as we've been doing:...

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Well, if you...

SENATOR MAXWELL: ...fetal homicide, wrongful death, assault.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...if you would look through my amendment, you would see that there is one in there that could cover that situation. But that...

SENATOR MAXWELL: I'd probably vote for it.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...that's all that I will ask you at this point, though,...

SENATOR MAXWELL: Okay.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...because I'm closing and I want to remind them what this amendment is. This amendment would give an accurate designation to this bill. Rather than calling it the Assault of an Unborn Child, it would be called the Assault on the Separation between Church and State Act. The discussions we've had this morning I think have not been unproductive. Nobody has been able to change anybody else's mind, which we knew when the bill came up, but nevertheless there has been an articulation by everybody who has spoken of his or her view in a way that could be understood even if it was not agreed with. My amendment has no chance of adoption, but in this manner, using it as a method of illumination of an issue, I want to call the public's attention to what is really going on here with this bill. There is an attempt to place into the law the creation of
